

Following through!

I WAS at the cigar lounge that I visit frequently and as usual the conversation turned into politics and the things that had happened since the election. I wasn't interested in the particulars of the conversation but into the deep aspect of what it takes for things to change.

Some of the questions that I asked were related to recent events. For example what had happened after the protests in Baltimore or in Ohio? What changes had happened as the consequence of the protests? What about the officers? What happened to them? What about the judicial system? Is it really reflecting and in fact producing the changes that the people are asking for? ~~the~~

What about the protesters?

what had they done to push their cause through? We live in the microwave, Internet twitter and Facebook times.
Everything is ~~instant~~ instantaneous and short lived... So the question that I Ask to myself is who is responsible for the changes that I would like to see in society to happen?
If and only if it's somebody-else's responsibility?

As you know I am a christian person, different in my approach to life and my christianity. According to my observation, experience and conviction, there is a design that God had created for us to fulfill our lives or in order to live abundantly. If and only if that's true then we should look after that design so we can live plenty-full lives (which doesn't have to do with how much you have or you don't)...

My point being that when we are talking about change or the changing process everything HAVE to start with me conceptually speaking because by concepts we live and die. But according to the Bible life can't be lived in isolation. Therefore we have to relate and do common-cause with those who live in our common-unities.

Getting together to protest alone, doesn't cut it. Getting together to talk alone, doesn't get it done either. It takes action, work ~~and~~ love investment in each other, ^{and} respect when we disagree. Not forgetting the commonalities that pull us together. Then and only then as a collective, as a society we will follow through and succeed.
